

Editorial serif italic for the greeting, Poppins for everything else. Warm and magazine-ish — but it's a face the brand doesn't use anywhere, and the italic reads more "wellness newsletter" than Bambora.

Hey mama 🙌 You've made a video — before you hit submit, let's make sure all of this is true.

Five checks and one look at the photos. That's it. Anything you're unsure about, message me instead of guessing.

Make sure these are true ALL 5 ✓

The seat is securely underneath baby's bottom

The one that matters most — every size, every carry.

One hand is supporting baby — in every single frame

Not most of the video. All of it.

The buckle is fully clicked and the safety loop is in use

Seated right over the clip, loop threaded and snug.

You're all set, mama.

Safe, sharp and ready to go. Hit submit — and tell me what you love about it when you send it.

One typeface, the brand's own. Hierarchy comes from weight and size instead of a second face — light grey for the greeting, medium for the instruction. The most minimal of the four, and the only one that looks like it came off the Bambora site.

A soft modern serif — upright, not italic — on the greeting and the section headings, Poppins underneath. Gives the page some warmth and personality without the newsletter feel of Option 1. Headings carry the brand's softness; the checklist itself stays crisp.

Rounded sans on the headings — the friendliest of the four and the closest to how parenting brands usually speak. Warm without being decorative. The trade-off: it reads a little younger and softer than the Bambora site currently does.
